Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .method courses for grades seven to twelve in this type of educational field--that is, where systematized knowledge as well as a rich background of personal experience are available on part of learners? (j) What of the possibilities of fully developed readings and conference methods in this field? Successful examples of problem or readings methods are so few that parallel examples are hardly yet available. But close analytical study of certain objectives, and of the adaptation of these methods to serving them, seem to promise rich results. (ft) Community civics as based partly upon a flexible reading text and partly upon observational access to, and partial interpretations of, local situations, has apparently proven functional for grades four to seven. Is it a good method beyond? Will it serve large group objectives? (J) The time is ripe for careful study of results in adult civic behavior of scouting and some other organized forms of extraschool civic education. (m) For the well-equipped sociological student certain other studies of extra-school education are practicable. (1) Take 20 men, thirty to forty years of age, who now rank manifestly as good citizens in their respective spheres. Study their social growth and experiences since leaving school, having in mind especially their current reading, political party associations, participation in voting and other civic activities, including vocational group membership. In what respects and to what extent can their present good citizenship be ascribed to their self-education and to their education from group contacts subsequent to...
